If you have any queries drop a comment below. The present invention relates generally to a duplex valve, and more particularly to a sump pump inlet or discharge valve having a plurality of adjustable diverter orifices for minimizing the pressure drop through the valve. Sump pump valves, particularly those for use with sump pumps, are common in the industry. Sump pump inlet or discharge valves are sometimes installed in parallel to one another and positioned slightly to the left or to the right to inhibit the passage of water from a common sump pan. The inlet and discharge valves typically have a housing with a single orifice that can be rotated to allow for a single set of functions. Often times these orifices are located at the mid-section of the housing and therefore the flow path has a constant width throughout. This arrangement causes a high pressure drop through the sump pump valves when water is passing through the valve. In some applications where the sump pump is close to the wall, the constant flow path width results in a very high pressure drop. A need in the art exists for a method for constructing sump pump valves that provides for a more optimal flow path through the valve, particularly for applications where the flow rate is significantly higher than normal.
