Yahoo-Oath Deal A Risky Move For Microsoft, Yahoo Shareholders Microsoft (MSFT) is picking up Yahoo (YHOO) for $5.4 billion, and shareholders are wary. Most analysts believe the deal is bad for Yahoo shareholders, but that doesn't mean they agree that Microsoft is being reckless in this move. What makes the transaction so controversial is that Microsoft already owns another popular search engine: Bing. If users start gravitating away from Yahoo, they may use Bing instead. Microsoft, which bought Skype for $8.5 billion in May, wants to make sure that the Skype brand doesn't go the way of the MySpace (MSPY) social network, which folded several years ago. And Bing could also represent an important source of revenue for Microsoft. "The real challenge is maintaining Skype's momentum and extending it to enterprise customers," analyst Bill Menezes of Gartner told Mashable in an email. "Skype is not as mature as Gmail or YouTube for a B2B [business-to-business] use case. Skype is still in its infancy, in

A: I had the same problem with multiple calendars and found a solution. First, I tried the "No group calendar" option. It doesn't work for multiple calendars and the others programs just shows the same info about it. The solution is to download a plugin to show more info. I downloaded the plugin called "myCalendar": You can change your resolution from full screen to a small window. Then all the info you want about your calendars are displayed in the window. You can also change the font, backgrounds, colors and size of the window. Skating in circles is a great way to stay in shape. Hang time, (letting the rope burn your palms or your fingers on a high-wire) is a good way to train your fingers. And then, there is this: You have two arms, but three arms. That way you don't have to use the same arm twice. This is John Cleese's quote, if you are interested. I am sure there is a whole bunch of other things that are already doing this.
