Some medical conditions, such as, cancer, result in stenosis (narrowing) of the normal artery in which it is fed. It is known to treat such stenoses with implantable stents. Stents take many forms, including balloon-expandable and self-expandable configurations, and are typically delivered through a sheath to the area of stenosis. The stents, after delivery, are compressed or collapsed to reduce their diameter in the sheath for intraluminal delivery. The stents of the present invention may be referred to as self-expanding stents or self-expanding stent delivery systems. Self-expanding stents are typically delivered in a contracted or collapsed state to a site of a stenosis, for example by passing the stent through a sheath to the site of the stenosis. At the site of the stenosis, the stent is configured to expand to the diameter of the artery and remain there indefinitely. Self-expanding stents are typically formed from a material such as nickel-titanium (nitinol) and self-expand at an elevated temperature where the nickel-titanium forms a metal-to-metal connection with the vessel wall. The stent can be elongated by a balloon or a catheter and is treated to achieve a desired shape and profile prior to deployment. Known self-expanding stents typically come in two varieties: monolithic and multiple phase. Multiple phase self-expanding stents use a high affinity nickel-titanium alloy as the first phase. This is supported by a second phase using a second alloy, such as stainless steel or a nitinol alloy. The first phase serves to rigidify the second phase and achieve the desirable self-expanding properties, such as the expansion of multiple phases at a single elevated temperature, i.e., austenite phase. One example of a multiple phase self-expanding stent is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,019,090 to Pinchuk. Multiple phase stents may also be fabricated from a single alloy. In the case of a single alloy self-expanding stent, the first phase serves to join the stent to an inner tubular member and the second phase serves to support the expansion force. One example of a single alloy self-expanding stent is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,354,309 to Khosravi. In

Budget numbers: Worst case vs. best case Published: Wednesday, March 26, 2013 at 2:31 p.m. Last Modified: Wednesday, March 26, 2013 at 2:31 p.m. It was quiet last night, and it's even quieter this morning. So let's get something out of the way from the beginning. There is no bad news in the 2012-13 budget numbers, nor any good news. More troubling is the continuing lack of leadership from lawmakers who have kept the legislature in hiding for the last six months. There is no budget. There's no plan. There is no backup plan to address the budget problems already announced or to address the potential problems with the growth in the population, the increasing health care expenses and the requirement of ever-increasing spending on the public schools. It's gotten to a point now that you don't know whether to laugh or cry. So, what does it mean that the numbers are in? Not too much. The worst case scenario for the 2012-13 budget is that it's a 7-cent tax increase. That would mean a tax increase of a little more than 2 percent. A tax increase that will very probably be rolled back in 2014. The best case is that the figure is less than 5 cents, a 1-cent or less tax cut that will most likely be rolled back. Let's start with the 7-cent tax increase scenario. In the next section, we'll go over the numbers and then we'll tell you why the figures are worse than 5 cents. In the 2012-13 budget, the total tax and fee revenue is $11,885,856,000. That's the entire budget. The budget actually came out at $11,834,446,000. It's important that you know that the revenue number does not mean that you will actually have a tax increase. For example, the county's sales tax receipts were down slightly by about 10 million dollars from the last budget year. But the county increased its budget by about $280 million. So tax revenue for the county was up about $27 million. On the other hand, the property tax receipts are up about $10.3 million compared to 2011-12. The biggest part of the budget is for schools. Here's the breakdown of the allocation of the $11
