The following opinion article was written by Alex Palmer and originally published at The AMS, the student-run network of the American Meteorological Society (AMS) and the National Weather Association (NWA). By Alex Palmer, AMS The storms that brought devastation across the United States this past fall were simply too much to ignore. Despite the predictable excuses, there is simply no way to argue that there were not large-scale, scientific, consequences to global warming. However, as the tales of heroism and courage that have marked this storm season recede into history, the Trump administration is poised to dismantle the most effective climate protection framework in existence. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) - the longest running and most accurate science-based document ever created - documents how climate change is increasing the severity, intensity, frequency, and duration of extreme weather and climate events. The 2017 report stated that the cost of these events worldwide will jump from $90 billion/year in 2007 to $366 billion by the end of the century. The most recent report included a meta-analysis of data on more than 250 events, documenting that the greatest floods in Australian history occurred at one-third the rate of the 30th century average. The US data analyzed by the above study was no exception, with some of the hardest hit local

I am out here in town until Thursday morning, so if you need to get a hold of me today, call my cell phone. I have not been to work this week and will be taking off the rest of the week of this coming weekend. Next week is business as usual. I have to say that the day I was officially off was pretty incredible. Mark had left a voice message and after I picked up the phone, he said, "Hi, this is Mark."
