Cyberspace and the Right to Freedom "The same person who made the bizarre claim that tweets from @realDonaldTrump could not be targeted, coordinated, and used as propaganda by the Russian government, had no problem saying that the US' own website was involved in Russian propaganda," wrote Lawfare blogger Steve Vladeck. As appalling as that is, Vladeck's description of the nonsense seems to apply to a number of people lately. The situation is very confusing. On one side, there's a "continuous state of armed conflict with an enemy of a kind which has never been seen before in the history of mankind," the President proclaimed last week in a speech to the nation. On the other side are national security experts, people like Stephen Walt, who opined last week in a public debate that at least since the end of World War II no other nation has embarked on a policy of "full-spectrum dominance" as we have done. Then we have the declarations of the Secretary of Defense that we have now achieved a new level of military supremacy and a new level of economic dominance in cyberspace. Not to be outdone, one of the highest U.S. government officials responsible for its defense, U.S. Strategic Command (USSTRATCOM), recently wrote that cyberspace is "the most critical, complex and desirable form of operation." To grasp what is actually going on with the US' military and CIA programs that are systematically penetrating the computers and communications of America and other nations, we will need to know a lot about the technology of these
